Bamon, a Mexican boy who has been prospecting within the boundaries of this county for some years past, has discovered a small, but phenomenally rich vein in the Owl Heads district. He brought to town ten and one-half ounces of pure silver bullion, which he claims to have extracted from 25 pounds of ore taken from his new find. The vein, he says, is only six inches wide, but if it will give as large a general average as did the 25 pounds of rock he smelted, all inches in width is enough for any man. Charles Dudley Warner is represented in the April Harper's by the first article of a short series of "Mexican Papers." Whatever Mr. Warner touches is certain to become attractive, and from | Erickson, Weil so fertile a subject as this we shall expect a rare treat, especially as he begins by saying, "To me Mexico is one of the most interesting countries I have seen, and so novel on every hand that I enjoyed in a way that which is disagreeable almost as much as that which is pleasing. It is novel, and yet, now and again, strangely familiar; for in its life P it is a patchwork sort of country, with a Rajo, Firsa Robles, Mercedes, degraded civilization, constantly suggesting in a second-hand way a halfdozen other countries and peoples. This paper describes the journey from El Paso to the City of Mexico, and shounds in bright, flashing pictures and droll turns of description like the following "At all the stations are crowds of boys, men, and women, who offer for sale oranges, sweets, and queer-looking fruits which are out of season and do not taste good, and they make a tremendons clamor. At Irapusto we bought a little basket of this fruit for fifty cents, not ripe but still sweet. The basket was stolidly filled with cabbage leaves; and disposed on top of this neatly, so as not to hide the leaves, wore a couple of dozen berries. These simple people have nothing to learn of Northern marketmen. We have struck a very old civilization." And again: "We passed through the famous deep cut or canal of Nochistongo. This cut was first made by the Indians as a drain for the valley. People have wondered what they did with the excavated earth; acquaintance with the Indians suggests the explanstion that they kept most of it on their persons.
